Paranormal Romance

When you live with a psychic, the future kisses you good morning as she tosses a pair of socks upon the bed that match the pants still in your head. So her gentle nudge reminds me of what hasn’t happened yet, and I dimly glimpse just where my watch should go to not get lost.

The women in my past preferred the present curve of my smile to what was hidden around the bend, but she knew it all before I could lie, even half-truths I forgot weren’t facts. She winked at me a week before I thought of going to the cheap motel, before I could wink at the waitress, so I left my side order cold and went home.

In the evening as we both undress I note her shy and certain look that goes beyond my shifting skin. I don’t know what she reads between the folds, but it must be good, or good enough.
