Poetry from the Porcelain Throne

Raleigh Fowler

I have found objective truth in bathroom stalls, flaunting the freedom of a forlorn fortress, bare bum plastered to a toilet seat, pasty skinned, awkward fumblings for single-ply redemption of my shortcomings, short-tempered contemplations found — formed — fragilely, barriers separating from the boisterous boasting of college fraternity brothers.
But what kind of man am I?
Certainly no Dalai Lama.
Silent swearer of curse words in bathroom stalls under fluorescent light fixtures, frightened at the forecast of intruders in my checkerboard-tiled fortress of solitude, sequestered soliloquies sung sitting serenely on the seat.
