

---

Traveling Leaves

by Sarah Luke

Plastic teeth of the rake under leaves, tip toe steps in pink tennis shoes because this is where the yellow jackets make their nests—under the earth—your hand, Hannah, between my dirt-caked fingers:
this is the other world, the thing you can't forget.

Inside the house, the stovetop decorated with oil-stained pans piled up to the underside of the microwave—I mean, we had nowhere to store them, but that wasn't the point;
the point was the staticky radio and our father's hands drumming an old Billy Joel rhythm onto a glass, a near-empty bottle of ketchup that gasped when you squeezed it, our mother, one hip against the sink, propping her elbow against a corner to wring out a wet towel for our fingers and all we wanted was something to dip our French fries into and to know who would claim the last fry.

The pockets of all your jeans are now filled with makeup-dusted quarters, mine with thrice-folded receipts from the drug store two months back. Where did the time go?
I don't know; does anyone?
Leaned against the rooftop of my car in late September, thinking

---

about the autumns that have come before and all those that may or may not come after.
I forget that yesterday is just another version of tomorrow, all its redundancy and bitterness, that the leaves I raked into a pile in the backyard yesterday are now traveling through the woods—the same leaves.