We challenge the candid friends of the Constitution and the Union to adduce any instance of a violation of rights, menaced or consummated, in the United States, where the people were marston for the perpetration of the opposite change. No instance of a violation of rights has, within the memory of the nation, ever been more consummated in the opposite change, and where that people were marston for the perpetration of the opposite change. No instance of a violation of rights has, within the memory of the nation, ever been more consummated, than in the present instance, where the people were marston for the perpetration of the opposite change.

For some months past, the abolitionists of the North have been elevating and exciting, and, at times, provoking a spirit of opposition to the Union and the Constitution. They have been spreading the doctrine of nullification, and have been publishing tracts and pamphlets, advocating the doctrines of the nullification and separation of the states from the Union. They have been persuading the people of the North to go to arms to defend their states, and have been inciting them to violence and insurrection.

But a few months has it been since the abolitionists of the North have been elevating and exciting the people to oppose the Union and the Constitution. They have been spreading the doctrine of nullification, and have been publishing tracts and pamphlets, advocating the doctrines of the nullification and separation of the states from the Union. They have been persuading the people of the North to go to arms to defend their states, and have been inciting them to violence and insurrection.

It was in this dangerous condition of public feeling that Senator Douglas, in order to advance his prospects for the Presidency, as he supposed, had written the Nebraska bill and had introduced it into the Senate. His object was to quiet the opposition and to bring about a feeling of contentment and satisfaction among the abolitionists. He had been successful in his object, and the bill had been passed by the Senate and sent to the House for further consideration.

The abolitionists of the North have been elevating and exciting the people to oppose the Union and the Constitution. They have been spreading the doctrine of nullification, and have been publishing tracts and pamphlets, advocating the doctrines of the nullification and separation of the states from the Union. They have been persuading the people of the North to go to arms to defend their states, and have been inciting them to violence and insurrection.

But a few months has it been since the abolitionists of the North have been elevating and exciting the people to oppose the Union and the Constitution. They have been spreading the doctrine of nullification, and have been publishing tracts and pamphlets, advocating the doctrines of the nullification and separation of the states from the Union. They have been persuading the people of the North to go to arms to defend their states, and have been inciting them to violence and insurrection.

It was in this dangerous condition of public feeling that Senator Douglas, in order to advance his prospects for the Presidency, as he supposed, had written the Nebraska bill and had introduced it into the Senate. His object was to quiet the opposition and to bring about a feeling of contentment and satisfaction among the abolitionists. He had been successful in his object, and the bill had been passed by the Senate and sent to the House for further consideration.

The abolitionists of the North have been elevating and exciting the people to oppose the Union and the Constitution. They have been spreading the doctrine of nullification, and have been publishing tracts and pamphlets, advocating the doctrines of the nullification and separation of the states from the Union. They have been persuading the people of the North to go to arms to defend their states, and have been inciting them to violence and insurrection.

But a few months has it been since the abolitionists of the North have been elevating and exciting the people to oppose the Union and the Constitution. They have been spreading the doctrine of nullification, and have been publishing tracts and pamphlets, advocating the doctrines of the nullification and separation of the states from the Union. They have been persuading the people of the North to go to arms to defend their states, and have been inciting them to violence and insurrection.

It was in this dangerous condition of public feeling that Senator Douglas, in order to advance his prospects for the Presidency, as he supposed, had written the Nebraska bill and had introduced it into the Senate. His object was to quiet the opposition and to bring about a feeling of contentment and satisfaction among the abolitionists. He had been successful in his object, and the bill had been passed by the Senate and sent to the House for further consideration.

The abolitionists of the North have been elevating and exciting the people to oppose the Union and the Constitution. They have been spreading the doctrine of nullification, and have been publishing tracts and pamphlets, advocating the doctrines of the nullification and separation of the states from the Union. They have been persuading the people of the North to go to arms to defend their states, and have been inciting them to violence and insurrection.

But a few months has it been since the abolitionists of the North have been elevating and exciting the people to oppose the Union and the Constitution. They have been spreading the doctrine of nullification, and have been publishing tracts and pamphlets, advocating the doctrines of the nullification and separation of the states from the Union. They have been persuading the people of the North to go to arms to defend their states, and have been inciting them to violence and insurrection.

It was in this dangerous condition of public feeling that Senator Douglas, in order to advance his prospects for the Presidency, as he supposed, had written the Nebraska bill and had introduced it into the Senate. His object was to quiet the opposition and to bring about a feeling of contentment and satisfaction among the abolitionists. He had been successful in his object, and the bill had been passed by the Senate and sent to the House for further consideration.

The abolitionists of the North have been elevating and exciting the people to oppose the Union and the Constitution. They have been spreading the doctrine of nullification, and have been publishing tracts and pamphlets, advocating the doctrines of the nullification and separation of the states from the Union. They have been persuading the people of the North to go to arms to defend their states, and have been inciting them to violence and insurrection.

But a few months has it been since the abolitionists of the North have been elevating and exciting the people to oppose the Union and the Constitution. They have been spreading the doctrine of nullification, and have been publishing tracts and pamphlets, advocating the doctrines of the nullification and separation of the states from the Union. They have been persuading the people of the North to go to arms to defend their states, and have been inciting them to violence and insurrection.