Ars Poetica: For When the Smoke Clears Amanda Cordle

Poetry is a language I know best when I lose myself when I am nothing but a mirage of who I could have should have been before I choked on the ash of perfection and burnt myself to the ground

Some nights, the words flow easily across the page like stars against the ink-black sky reminding me that tragically beautiful is simply a poet’s term for desolation That the stars we wonder at are dying, burning to nothing. That document is both a solace and a cage Despondency has a way of making itself a muse For I have loved the words so much that they’ve absorbed me made me a slave to the ebbs and flows of sadness for the sake of an art I will always run home to I have forgotten to write of beauty have forgotten to write of wild lilacs in the forest, and the orange streaked sky at sunset. I have forgotten the balance of nature-- er her seasons er her decay er her bloom
