Clarification

Baptist Historical Collection still at Furman

The article in the winter issue of Furman announcing that the university will no longer receive funding from the South Carolina Baptist Convention to support the university's Baptist Historical Collection has apparently caused some misunderstandings.

To clarify: While the collection will no longer have convention support, most of the historic documents pertaining to Baptist life in the state will remain in the James B. Duke Library archives. Because Furman no longer serves as the archives for the convention, the papers of individuals employed by the convention or by the General Board are being returned to the Baptist Building in Columbia. According to J. Glen Clayton, special collections librarian and archivist, these papers represent only a small part of the collection.

All other materials in the collection will remain at Furman, including:

- Manuscripts of state Baptist leaders such as Richard Furman, James C. Furman, William B. Johnson and Basil Manly, Jr.
- All books, including official publications such as convention annuals and Baptist association minutes.
- All church records on microfilm.
- All biographical files.
- All files on churches.
- All photographs.

In short, Furman remains the place to visit for anyone interested in the history of Baptists in South Carolina. Researchers should visit the Baptist Building in Columbia if they're interested in examining the papers of the former executive secretary-treasurers of the South Carolina Baptist Convention.
