Then: Reflection on the importance of Furman as it was

Yendelela Neely Holston ’03

Follow this and additional works at: https://scholarexchange.furman.edu/furman-magazine

Recommended Citation
Holston, Yendelela Neely ’03 (2018) "Then: Reflection on the importance of Furman as it was," Furman Magazine: Vol. 61 : Iss. 2 , Article 8.
Available at: https://scholarexchange.furman.edu/furman-magazine/vol61/iss2/8

This Regular Feature is made available online by Journals, part of the Furman University Scholar Exchange (FUSE). It has been accepted for inclusion in Furman Magazine by an authorized FUSE administrator. For terms of use, please refer to the FUSE Institutional Repository Guidelines. For more information, please contact scholarexchange@furman.edu.
“IT WAS THE MOST FUN I HAD IN 2016.”

Whitener — wearing the coveted “Burt shirt” — and Reynolds at the 2017 Tribeca Film Festival in New York City.

I will never forget entering the front gates of Furman for the first time. It was in April 1998, and Furman was my first college visit. While I did not visit nearly as many colleges as students do today, I did visit enough to know that Furman was special. The way the sun hit the leaves on the trees lining the entrance created an enchanting scene. I felt as if I was entering a magical place. And I was right.

However, the magic of Furman is not just in the majesty of the campus (which still takes my breath away). You feel a difference when you enter “the Furman bubble.” And it’s a difference I have not experienced anywhere since.

While a student, I was exposed to more people and cultures than I could have ever imagined I would at this small school in Greenville, South Carolina. I learned about the history and politics of Southern Africa as I traveled South Africa, Botswana, Swaziland and Namibia with professors Dan Gordon and Erik Ching.

And I learned so much more within Furman’s gates. I learned the history of India and Pakistan from a Pakistani-American classmate who also introduced me to Ramadan and a deeper understanding of Islam, an understanding that I was particularly aware of as this classmate and I watched the collapse of the second tower in the political science department common area on the morning of September 11, 2001. A classmate of Palestinian descent with the most analytical mind I have ever met gave me my first perspective on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. And I, the descendant of slaves, would frequently sit in the student center to discuss life (and occasionally the history of the American South) with a friend and descendent of a proud Confederate family.

These interactions are how I remember Furman: a place where differing perspectives converge and where open and honest dialogue can result if you are receptive to it. At Furman, I gained a great appreciation for differing viewpoints. I learned how to separate people from their beliefs in this beautiful place where people from all backgrounds come together to live and learn from each other. That was the magic that Furman showed me.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Yendelela Neely Holston ’03 is partner and chief diversity & inclusion officer at Kilpatrick Townsend. A member of the Furman Board of Trustees, Holston received the Corporate Counsel Community Champion Award in May.