OKINAWANS

- Live on the southernmost islands, equidistant between China and have historical ties to both.

- Site of intense fighting in WWII, occupied until 1972 and still houses most of the US military presence in Japan.

Korea was annexed in 1910, making then Japanese nationals. Some migrated voluntarily to Japan, others were forced during wartime.

Many were unable to return to Korea, resulting in several generations of Zainichi with no legal status as Japanese despite being Japanese culturally.

NEW MIGRANTS

- Broad term for post-war migrants; often motivated by economics and currently by Japan’s labor shortage
- Japan is hesitant to let in migrants, due to a belief that their ethnic homogeneity creates harmony that would be lost if they became more diverse

Before and during the war, Japan was defined as a multiethnic, pan-Asian empire.

After, the narrative shifted, with the result being a reinforcement of the invisibility of minority groups.

Japan broadly associates ethnic diversity with conflict, which creates barriers to the improvement of conditions for minorities.
